TEACHING

- Undergraduate Courses Taught at the University of Alberta

EDPY 302 Learning and Development in Childhood

Educational Psychology 302 (EDPY 302) is an introductory-level course in human development and learning. This course is directed towards students who expect to work with children (ages 0-12). It is designed to provide students with the opportunity to study childhood development and learning with a particular focus on the application of theory to educational practice. In this course students will gain an understanding of how children from a diversity of backgrounds develop and learn and how teachers can provide appropriate learning opportunities that support students' educational, physical, cognitive, social, cultural, moral, and psychological development.

EDPY 304 Adolescent Development and Learning

This course is directed towards students who expect to work with adolescents (ages 11-17). It is designed to provide you with the opportunity to study adolescent development with a particular focus on the application of developmental theory to educational practice. We begin by examining the biological and cognitive changes associated with adolescence. Next, we consider how these internal changes influence the adolescent's role within the social context of their family, peers, school, work, etc. Finally, we will focus on individual differences in adolescent development including current problems and ways to support resiliency. During the course, students are expected to reflect on how adolescent development impacts them as a teacher.

- Graduate Courses Taught at the University of Alberta

EDPY 500 Introduction to Data Analysis in Educational Research

The purpose of this course is to present students with an introduction to descriptive and inferential univariate statistics commonly used in social science research. I emphasize two main aspects of statistical reasoning: (a) computational formulas and assumptions, and (b) appropriate uses of univariate statistics in educational research.

The lab to this course provides students with an opportunity to use a computer statistical package to analyze data. A thorough understanding of the topics covered in this course prepares students for more advanced graduate work in educational statistics and ensures that students can begin to conduct their own data analyses.

EDPY 501 Introduction to Methods in Educational Research

Research design is a foundational aspect of thinking and drawing evidence-based conclusions from educational and social scientific research. There are many courses to be taken in research design. The purpose of this course is to provide an overview of research design. This overview consists of understanding the preliminary considerations that go into selecting a qualitative, quantitative, or mixed methods research design. These include knowing the definition for these different approaches, considering philosophical worldviews, reviewing the literature, understanding the use of theory in relation to research questions and data, anticipating ethical issues, and developing writing strategies. We will discuss the process of research as it relates to each approach. This process includes writing an introduction, specifying a purpose statement, and developing research questions and/or hypotheses. This course will also discuss the methods and procedures for quantitative, qualitative, and mixed methods studies

EDPY 505 Advanced Univariate Statistics in Educational Research

The purpose of this course is to present students with advanced univariate procedures. The majority of the semester is spent on multiple regression and advanced analysis of variance models (e.g., mixed repeated measure models). I emphasize two aspects of statistical reasoning as we examine these models, namely: (a) computational formulas and assumptions, and (b) appropriate uses of advanced univariate statistics in social science research. A thorough understanding of multiple regression and advanced analysis of variance procedures prepares students for study of multivariate statistical analysis and ensures that students can conduct their own data analyses. In addition, the laboratory component of the course makes it possible for students to learn how to carry out ANOVA and Regression analyses using computer software, namely SPSS.

EDPY 510 Learning, Cognition, and Education

The purpose of this course is to present current views/theories on thinking and learning, and how these views can be applied in educational settings. The process of thinking, including what it means to “think well” has traditionally been the focus of cognitive psychology and other disciplines such as philosophy and economics. Understanding what thinking entails and what it means to think well is vital to promoting successful life-long learning. In this course, we focus on examining views on thinking and discuss how these views can be used successfully in applied educational settings.

EDPY 608 Selected Topics in Educational Measurement (validity)

The purpose of this course is to critically examine current issues in the field of measurement and evaluation. Two topics are discussed: The first topic is validity, its definition, and what it entails within educational measurement drawing on seminal research and theoretical formulations. The second topic discussed is the role of cognitive psychology in educational measurement

EDPY 610 Selected Topics in Learning, Cognition, and Education

This course is designed to introduce students to advanced topics in the study of complex cognition and learning—in particular, the transfer of research on cognition and learning into classroom practice. The majority of the term is spent reading and critically analyzing research articles on cognition and learning in terms of their objectives, research methodology, and educational implications for classroom practice. Students read primary theoretical and empirical research and take turns leading class discussions, in which the critical analysis of research methodology and conclusions are fostered. Students also develop and present methods for innovative research translation to stakeholders.

A seminar course intended to explore, through reading and practical discussion of clinically-relevant reading material, the role of the psychologist as consultant and collaborator. Topics discussed in this course include models/theories, related skill development, evaluation/techniques, and issues and trends related to consultation and collaboration. Restricted to PhD students enrolled in the School and Clinical Child Psychology and Counselling Psychology programs.

This course gives students a specific introduction to the “cognitive characteristics” of educational achievement tests by (a) drawing on both seminal and current cognitive research in reasoning and problem solving, and (b) applying this research to the analysis of test items so as to evaluate the degree to which the items measure what they are referenced to measure. In addition, students examine how to construct test items that measure specific cognitive skills. Students are expected to learn the major theories and findings in reasoning and problem solving, and be able to understand, challenge, and evaluate these findings against the assumptions and research advanced in the educational measurement literature. This course goes together, as part of a series, with EDPY 697—The Construction and Analysis of Attitude Surveys.
